Romanesque art is for the most part religious in its imagery, but this is partly a matter of what has survived, and there are examples of secular art from the period. Unusual is a casket in The British Museum, a product of Limoges craftsmanship, which is made of wood with champlevé enamels attached to it (produced by heating powdered glass set into grooves hollowed out of bronze plate).

Tabernacle, unknown maker, about 1180. Musuem no. 7650-1861. Romanesque is a modern term describing the art and architecture produced in Western Europe in the period 1000-1200. The style used the art of the Roman Empire as a principal source of creative inspiration. It also drew upon Scandinavian and Islamic traditions, as well as those of the Christian centres at Jerusalem, Constantinople and Rome.
